The pharmacological blockage of the renin-angiotensin system (RAS) has proven effective in the therapy of hypertension. In recent years, a number of physiological actions of the RAS independent of angiotensin II production have emerged, including a significant role for natriuretic peptides. This has led to the discovery of natriuretic peptide receptor (NPR) as a novel receptor system, which plays a critical role in blood pressure regulation. In addition, the vascular system is a major endocrine organ where there is a cross-talk between the RAS and the natriuretic peptide system. There is a growing body of evidence which suggests that natriuretic peptide synthesis and its receptors are upregulated in vascular tissues during the induction of hypertension and that blockade of the natriuretic peptide system may be of therapeutic benefit in some forms of experimental and clinical hypertension. Furthermore, recent studies in animal models show that natriuretic peptide system antagonists can reduce the progressive deterioration of the vascular system and may be an attractive treatment strategy in the future. This review will summarize the key pharmacological actions of the natriuretic peptide system and highlight a potential therapeutic approach to hypertension.Q: Passing Variables across to Tcl Script I have the following tcl script file: #!/usr/bin/tclsh eval append [::prompt] " flush stdout for {set a {5 1}} {$a>2} {incr a -1} {set a [format "%04.0f" $a]} #flush stdout for {set i 0} {$
