It is created by assembling a sequence of still images (frames) to create a moving image of an event. It can be one- or two-dimensional, and it may be a part of multimedia, where additional audio or sound effects are added. Video can be recorded on an analog or digital medium, and can be transmitted as live or as a recorded media or file. The most common format of a video file is the Moving Picture Experts Group (MPEG) format. For playing and viewing content stored in MPEG format, a player is required. Some formats have a video layer, separate from the audio layer. Other formats do not have a separate video layer, instead incorporating aspects of the audio and video layers.
