Prison Rape: What China Won't Admit While the U.S. has been pondering mass incarceration and the rationales for harsh sentencing, China has been quietly experimenting with the maximum security system for crimes of "political" nature. Among the first people to test it was Ai Weiwei – a dissident whose detention for a visual art installation prompted the United Nations to criticize its countries for a "serious and sustained campaign to silence critical voices, putting peaceful dissent, including through the internet and other forms of expression, in the hands of the criminal justice system." It's been nearly a year since Ai was re-arrested, and over four months since he was initially subjected to forced labor. And in those four months Ai has endured the cruelest punishment known to man. In his political activism, Ai ran into organized crime groups in China. He was labeled a criminal in 2011, and convicted of tax evasion (pursuant to a highly publicized, redundant tax investigation) and embezzlement. For a time he was held in a secret location where the only moment of contact with the outside world was a visit with his legal team at a government-approved hour, and regular visits from his wife. He's been incarcerated in several maximum security facilities, the most notoriously the infamous Daxin Prison in Hebei province. Ai has been completely isolated from the outside world, and expected to spend a minimum of two years living in the prison without human contact. Authorities report that the former artist is surviving on cat food and water. And when he was recently given access to his family, even the short and increasingly rare visits have been watched by surveillance cameras. Ai kept his entire blog in English, even though he didn't speak or read English. What's important is that he used the blog to try and get a public response from 595f342e71
