“As a FIFA community, we are always striving to improve the game and continue to push the boundaries of realism. Motion capture technology is a key tool in the armoury of our AI, which is able to keep pace with the extensive array of skills and movements seen on the pitch in real time. It's an authentic experience on all fronts,” said David Rutter, Creative Director at EA SPORTS. “With this, our players can now tackle, dribble and pass with a greater degree of realism and more intent.” “We've spent time testing and analyzing data from real-life football matches in order to develop a technology that was an ideal fit for FIFA,” added Daniel Baldwin, FIFA Technical Director. “FIFA 22 will be the best yet, and this technology will continue to drive us towards a deeper simulation in the years to come.”

HyperMotion Technology A key development area for FIFA on current-gen hardware is to ensure that each facet of the game is as detailed and as realistic as possible on console, PC and next-gen platforms, including the addition of the in-game player models, player likeness, animations, player data, ball physics, on-pitch gameplay feedback and crowd noise. As part of the development process for FIFA 22, the FIFA team has been very innovative in how this groundbreaking technology was implemented. This led to new ideas being tested and perfected, resulting in FIFA 22 features that are, to date, more technologically advanced than any other football game on the market. The main goal with HyperMotion Technology was to provide additional benefits for players at all levels of the game. “The key innovation of HyperMotion Technology is that we've allowed our in-game AI to run at the same intensity as our players, through movements that are as close as possible to real-life,” said Daniel Baldwin. “The result is a much more polished FIFA experience.”
