REUTERS/Shannon Stapleton When two independent healthcare-research organizations released a new study on Sunday showing that 99.7 percent of people in the U.S. have something wrong with them, it left some immediately asking why the findings weren't getting more attention. Some tried to use this study to gloss over the bad news in a slightly altered way, while others sought to celebrate the study's findings. But the report's publication on Sunday might be the most under-reported news yet on American health. Despite the excitement of the study, health policy experts are concerned that the study's sensationalist headline and wording are distracting people. The one-word phrase "99.7 percent" is a major red flag, health policy analysts said, as other studies have previously shown that the U.S. has shockingly high rates of degenerative diseases. The U.S. now has the highest obesity rates and the highest rates of diabetes in the world, among other health problems. After the study was published, Kristine Grow, managing director of The Athena Health Research Group at Indiana University, said that the study "confirms what we've been hearing from patients and the public in general - that they are not happy with how their health care is going." The Athena Research Group study is actually a subset of the American Public Health Association's "Phenomenon of Unmet Health Care Needs in America" study, which tracked the health and well-being of respondents age 18 and older. The study was released on Monday and the full findings, which show that 24 million adults in the U.S. reported having multiple chronic conditions, will be published later this year. The portion of the report discussing unmet health needs focuses on the serious health conditions that people struggle to get the care and treatments they need

Just Download Or Stream This Movie In High Definition Quality.Simon Fraser University has had two chances in the past few years to change the way it trains physicians and clinical students in British Columbia, and has failed. Last spring, the university's faculty senate asked the school's provost to direct the deans of medicine, nursing and pharmacy to consider changes to their senior medical school programme. The faculty's call was prompted by the medical school's poor performance in the 2012 Canadian Resident Matching Incentive Program, which matches new Canadian medical graduates (M3s) with internal medicine positions in Canada and the United States. The Canadian Institute of Health Information revealed that SFU's internal medicine residency programme had the second highest rate of "wasted" placements of all the Canadian medical schools surveyed. Dr. Paul Johnson, chair of the department of medical education at SFU, pointed out the difference between what the M3s and the residents ended up doing. In most of the other schools, 50% of residents end up practising in internal medicine within three years of graduating, while in SFU's program, only 23% do. Story continues below advertisement For the three years prior to SFU's faculty senate's intervention, Dr. Johnson said, administration had been telling the faculty that teaching the Canadian Medical Education

Directives for Specialists, the core medical school curriculum, was central to improving the school's curriculum. Over the years, Dr. Johnson noted, SFU had become one of the very few medical schools in Canada that didn't teach it. But in April, less than a month before the M3s would be matched, Dr. Johnson said, the dean of medicine, Dr. Kevin Litchen, made a decision to keep teaching CMED. Dr. Litchen has been dean since 2010. The change was accepted by university-wide policy-making bodies, including the university president, Dr. Peter T. Martland. And it was accepted by the four UBC schools that partner with the SFU med school, all three of which teach CMED. "I think that when Dr. Litchen made his announcement we all heard the words 'CMED'," Dr. Johnson said, "and, as always, with him, it was never anything that he was forced to do. It was always something that he had thought about, and been persuaded to do, and what
