Les Mills Body Combat: Emergence of a cyclic bacterial community in an indoor biofilter treating cooking emissions. The community of bacteria in an indoor biofilter for the biological treatment of organic vapours produced by the ovens of a food industry, was investigated over a period of 20 weeks. Samples were taken from different sections of the biofilter and analysed for species composition, activity and functioning. The results show that the early stages of biofilter development were characterised by an initial drop in activity and a change in the bacterial community, with members of the Pasteurellaceae, such as Haemophilus, prevalent in the biofilm, and Actinomycetaceae, such as Arthrobacter, also present. Later stages of biofilter development show an increase in activity accompanied by a reversion to the community structure present prior to the installation of the biofilter. The early stage of the biofilter is thought to be critical for the design and operation of the system. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a lens control device, and more particularly, to a lens control device capable of automatically adjusting a focal length. 2. Description of the Prior Art In a conventional camera, the focal length can be adjusted manually through a focus adjustment ring installed on a lens. Or the focal length can be adjusted in response to an electric signal received from a circuit and a sensing circuit installed on a lens. However, the degree of focusing achieved by the conventional lens control device is limited and cannot be accurately controlled by merely adjusting the focal length manually or in response to an electric signal. In addition, if there is a change in the brightness of the light source, or the light source is dim, the conventional lens control device does not function properly. As a result, the picture taken by the conventional lens control device may be blurred or otherwise have incorrect focusing. The conventional lens control device is thus not practical.
