indesign's artboards are placed on the page to provide a working space for laying out a page. layers, placed within the artboard, define how the text and images are formatted. for example, you can group text by choosing the group layer option from the layers panel, and create a new group by clicking the desired name in the panel. you can create, edit, or delete groups as needed. indesign automatically creates a group layer called "backgrounds". you can change the name of the group layer from the layers panel. you can also use the "backgrounds" group to create a template. you can create and modify a "pattern" template, which defines a pre-formatted background for the page. indesign allows you to edit the individual colors of a swatch. you can use the swatches panel to choose a color and its color values from a variety of colors and patterns. you can use the color picker tool to pick a color from the page or color swatch, or you can drag the color or pattern swatch directly to the page. indesign allows you to create a new shape from an existing graphic or path, and group the new object with other shapes. you can resize and reposition the group, but you cannot resize or reposition the individual shapes within the group. the inputted values are represented in various ways depending on the type of the inputted variable. for example, the list contains variables in a numerical format, while a data map contains variables in a geographic format. the students and teachers computer software program is an educational software application for windows that brings together a number of useful features for the pupils and the teachers. the application was released in 1992. the software has been designed to teach the people and to make the students more familiar with the windows system. this software is mainly used in the schools and it offers many functions. most of them are related to the visual tools, and they are useful for the people who need to create the documents for the school projects. in addition, the program has a dictionary, math and science lessons, a quiz, news and an internet browser. the program has been developed by the team of people who made the software for the students and for the teachers. 5ec8ef588b
