computerized CT angiography method for assessing cochlear nerve trunk and internal auditory canal diameter to assess the lateral semicircular canal. The objective was to develop and evaluate a method to measure the diameter of the cochlear nerve trunk and inner ear canal in computed tomography (CT) scans of the temporal bones. Twelve temporal bone CT scans were selected for this study. For each subject, four slices were segmented and the inner and outer diameters of the cochlear nerve trunk and inner ear canal were measured. The results were recorded, evaluated and compared to the measurements of the normal subject. The measured inner diameter of the cochlear nerve trunk was smaller than the normal size in 11 out of 12 ears (91.7%), with a mean difference of 0.1 mm. This difference was not significant. The measured outer diameter of the cochlear nerve trunk was smaller than the normal in 1 out of 12 ears (8.3%), with a mean difference of 0.7 mm. The mean difference was not significant. Only in a single case of an asymmetric temporal bone was there a significant difference between the inner (mean, 0.04 mm)
