I've been a freelance journalist for most of the last decade, covering everything from lifestyle to business to the automotive industry, and I've always reached for Lightroom when editing my photos. This was largely because Lightroom's flexibility gave me the freedom to quickly reorganize my raw files into more useful file structures, get the files ready for print, and tweak my images without fear of ruining them. I also needed the same editing tools as film photographers to make my shooting look like what they got in film studios. For instance, using my digital darkroom, I could fake filters such as cross-process film grain and color correction. In truth, a lot of people use Lightroom in much the same way they used their digital darkroom — to quickly tweak images to fit their shooting style, then transfer them to the Internet for publication. The one real advantage that Lightroom has over Photoshop is that it makes it easy to share images. With Lightroom, I could watch a client or client's family mark up photos and suggest edits from my iPad. (The app runs on both iOS and Android.) I would then batch-import the exported photos into an editorial spread. It was very fast without the network latency. In fact, this setup enabled me to collaborate with a client over Facebook Messenger, talking about upcoming spreads while in the studio, respectively, all the while editing on one of my two computers.
